You're outdoors enjoying a late-summer picnic and within minutes, dozens of yellow, flying insects intrude on your fun. People often think, "Bees!" but these uninvited guests are just as likely to be yellow jackets, a type of ground-nesting wasp. Often confused with bees, yellow jackets are much more aggressive, and most reported "bee stings" may in fact be yellow jacket stings.

I've noticed many dead varroa mites as well and have to remind myself that this is normal in January. This is from Michael Bush: "This is the accumulation of many days of mites that can't get into cells because there is no brood, falling over a period of time. 40 or 50 a day is not considered unusual, so if you have a week's accumulation of 300 or so that would be pretty normal and ...
