I'm not saying that you have to write this way all the time, hyper-aware of your feelings and anticipating the readers' reactions. Not at all. But atmospheric writing comes with practice, and will often happen in the revision process; this is all part of how you develop your distinctive literary voice.

Why spend all that time preparing for a story when you could be writing it? The question of "how to outline your novel" sometimes seems like poking a sleeping bear with a pointy stick. The truth, however, is that a correctly wielded outline can be one of the most powerful weapons in your writing arsenal.
