Monsieur Pain. Like his later works, it plays with genre the way a cat plays with a mouse -- batting around the conventions of noir and toying with thriller-structure, then turning away in search of the next amusement. That amusement is often another of Bolaño's trademarks: an out-of-the-blue story-within-a-story,...

Editorial Reviews. The prevailing architecture of Monsieur Pain is the labyrinth—the hospital, city streets, a nightclub connected to a warehouse all imprison the protagonist in mazes through which he frantically rushes, only to end up face to face with no monster greater than himself...the evil in Monsieur Pain feels ominously real, despite the fact that Bolano hardly enunciates its presence.
