Ninety-two in the Shade is the story of a man struggling for purchase. Incomprehensible ranting occasionally interrupted by moments of humor and brilliant prose and more infrequently a plot. I couldn't help but feel, while reading, that the gaps between brilliance were more a result of my shortcomings as a reader.

Nailing the Opening: Thomas McGuane's Ninety-two in the Shade. But if forced to name the book I push most often on others it is Thomas McGuane's 1973 novel Ninety-two in the Shade. Now, befitting my awareness of our limited time, no one would ever call me a big fan of slow boilers or Dickensian doorstops.

Nothing is harder to isolate than the uncertain, unstable chemistry of a McGuane novel (The Sporting Club; The Bushwhacked Piano) catalyzed by great humor and a latent if everpresent violence. Ninety-Two in the Shade, flashing with just that kind of intensity, is set in the Florida keys where young Tom Skelton who ""required a sense of mortality"" has gotten his shaky self together to the ...
