My Sister's Hand in Mine by Jane Bowles. I dreamed I climbed upon a cliff, My sister's hand in mine. Then searched the valley for my house, But only sunny fields could see And the church spire shining. I searched until my heart was cold But only sunny fields could see, And the church spire shining. A girl ran down the mountainside

Who can really understand Bowles' writing? Well, some people can, but not I. Nonetheless I love it, and it has the irrefutable hyper-reality of dreams. Only a very few other writers (Denis Johnson is one) have used American English with such exactitude and so cracklingly, have observed so fearlessly the emotional abysses that confront us, and are so deliriously funny.
